Symposium on Religion and Social Welfare. Lutheranism and Societal Development.

Research has pointed to similarities in European development across confessions from the Reformation onwards, and likewise to the fact that understandings and systems of welfare within Europe today follow confessional boundaries. While the reformation changed legal responsibility for the poor in the Protestant countries, continuity from the middle ages is also obvious.

Each of the three major confessions in Europe has its specific perception of deserving and undeserving poor, of work, of social responsibility and authority, but the consequences of this in relation to poor relief and social responsibility in general have been debated.

When Max Weber developed his work on The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, he deliberately and almost exclusively drew on the reformed tradition and Calvinism. Nevertheless, there has been a strong tendency in academic work to use his results as covering both the reformed and the Lutheran countries. The aim of this symposium is to challenge this understanding of Protestantism as one and discuss the possibility of talking of a Lutheran social ethic or teaching with consequences for the development of a Nordic model for societal development and, eventually, welfare.

The symposium is the first of two to be held in collaboration between LUMEN, Center for the Study of Lutheran Theology and Confessional Societies and AIAS, Aarhus Center for Advanced Studies, with support from the research programs at the Department of Theology and the Department of History and Classical Studies. The symposiums will address questions central to investigations into the influence of religion on societal development and the formation of welfare states.
